HARLEY'S MARRIAGE.

Continued from sixth page. He was clearly in a state of great excitement.

"I saw it was past 11 o'clock, shook him by the hand, and with a 'God bless you!' left the room abruptly, for I saw that that was the best course.

In half an hour I was on board, just as the paddles commenced to revolve; and then I sat down to read the letter, which I still then had not time to look at.

It was a letter from the family solicitor at home, announcing, in the first place, the death of Harley's father, which occurred somewhat suddenly, and of which more particulars were to be sent by the next mail.

"Poor Mrs. Jones is dead; and on her deathbed she sent for me and made a confession of the most singular kind—to me, a most distressing revelation. You are not my son, as I have so long fondly supposed.

"The child was buried; and then the fear of discovery preventing her from returning home, she was determined to go and settle in some place where she was really unknown.

"My dear John, notwithstanding what has happened, I feel that you are still mine—my son in all but the name; and, to enable you to keep your surname legally, I have executed a deed making you a gift of the Perton estate, on condition that you retain the name of Harley.

"I have been aware of this changed relationship for a few months; and, as I could not bear the thought of severing the ties that had so long bound us together as father and son, came to this resolution—a weak one, perhaps, but such as you will readily pardon—

"I read the letter with strange feelings, in which I scarcely knew whether surprise or pleasure was predominant. I could also now understand John's agitation; for if he had thus lost one who had been to him a father, he had been at the same time delivered from a sorrow which would have been life long in its effects, both on him and the woman he loved.

"On my arrival at Batavia I hastened to Mrs. Van Dusen and asked to see her alone. She was, as the reader may imagine, quite overcome at my unexpected intelligence. I found that she had confessed the whole circumstance to her daughter. 'My conscience told me it was the right course to pursue, though dear John meant kindly; but I could not be contented while deceiving my child.'

"In a day or two the steamer was to return to Singapore, and brief as the time for preparation was, both S. and Mrs. Van Dusen accompanied me in her. With their care and nursing Harley soon recovered health and strength; and then, after again going to Batavia to settle Mrs. Van Dusen's affairs previous to her bidding a final farewell to Java, they all three sailed for England.

NIHILISTIC VENGEANCE.

True Account of the Blowing Up of the Czar's Train at Moscow in 1879.

The whole night was spent in filling a large copper cylinder, seven feet high and one-half foot in diameter, with dynamite. Though I had got used to dynamite at our factory in St. Petersburg, still now I was unable to bear with it.

"Does not the Government steamer sail to-day for Batavia?" "Yes at two o'clock," said I, "and it is now past one."

"Go off and get some money, and take passage to Batavia. Take the letter, read it, and give it to Mrs. Van Dusen. Come back with the steamer, or I shall go mad with expectation."

"He guessed my thoughts. 'I'm all right, Ingram,' he said, 'I shall soon be well. The letter will explain all. But be off, or you will miss the steamer.'
